Why does language change? Approaches and discussions: a dialogue between linguistics and philosophy.

Linguistic change is a topic that lies at the heart of linguistic research but is not sufficiently understood to this day. The main reason for this is that it is a multi-causal phenomenon inextricably linked to the capacity for human language itself. The origins of change are rooted in cognitive, social, information-theoretic, behavioural, and developmental processes and phenomena. Due to this highly interdisciplinary nature and its theoretic implications concerning neighbouring fields, the study of linguistic change benefits from exchanges with various other disciplines. With this talk introducing the basic lines of language change research, I want to prompt such an exchange between linguistics and philosophy to engage in discussion and debate from different viewpoints.

Alle Interessierten, insbesondere Studierende, sind herzlich eingeladen.
